A well-written report can significantly impact an investigation and prosecution of a case. Unfortunately, little time is typically invested in sharpening and improving this essential function of police work. Most officers have not taken a report writing course since their basic academy training. This course will highlight areas of report writing that officers typically lack. Officers will be educated on the basic 101 of police report writing, cover case laws and ethics and how both affect report writing.

This training will also discuss Terry Stops and how to properly document them. Officers will also learn how to document their use of force, as it is often taken for granted, until officers are scrutinized for it. Officers will leave this class feeling more confident in their report writing skills by using the techniques taught throughout the course.

This training is designed for new recruits to veteran officers.

Required Equipment: Note-taking material

Instructor:

Officer Erich Weider has been in law enforcement for over 25 years, is currently employed as an Adjunct Instructor at Gateway Technical College and is also a certified LESB instructor. For the past 20 years, Erich has taught report writing in the Law Enforcement Academy. In addition, he was also a Field Training officer for approximately 17 years. Between the two assignments, Erich gained vast experience in reviewing reports from recruits to veteran officers. He has instructed over 1,400 law enforcement professionals in various topics. In addition, Erich has reviewed and critiqued thousands of reports from law enforcement officers.
